(By Associated Press.) PHILADELPHIA, Nov. 3.—A. C. Miller, member of the federal reserve board, told the national conference on financing the war that inflation has already begun, and that American business must not undertake to carry the war as an "extra," but must realize that great changes in economic organization are essential to victory. He estimated the nation's savings at $15,000,000,000 annually and said it must be increased by $5,000,000,000 to meet the expenses of the war.

He further said of the $15,000,000,000 $12,000,000,000 would be left to absorb the loans, after deducting $3,000,000,000 to meet war taxes. He declared that inflation is partially responsible for the rise in price of commodities and that if the increase continued it would be unreasonable to expect that before long the federal reserve system would be converted into a great engine for banking inflation.
